ORATION

By a Sardis Young Man at Marietta College Arrests Wide Attention.

A Marietta, O., newspaper publishes the following about S. C. Morris, son of M. L. Morris, of Sardis, this county, a thirteen-year-old graduate of Broadus Institute a few years ago, who is now graduating at Marietta College.

The following oration, when delivered at the annual G. A. R. Memorial Day contest, Monday evening, by Mr. Morris, who is a Senior in the college, was awarded first prize.

A certain great Englishman once came to visit America. He spent a few weeks in our largest cities and a few days upon our limited trains. Then he was prepared after the manner of great Englishmen to characterize the American people with a word.

"America," said he, "is a land of creeds and cranks. But the people have only one religion. They worship with unlimited faith their United States."

However unhappy his method of emphasis, the Englishman stated at least a half truth. The average American has been nothing if not patriotic. And with us patriotism has not been idle optimism. With us patriotism has not been platitude by faith. With us patriotism has been justified by national achievement and by national character.

For surely no other nation has behind it such a magnificent and quickly-executed material achievement as was the conquest of the American continent. Surely history has no brighter pages than those that tell of American expansion. Surely time has no more inspiring drama than that of Puritan and Pioneer and Plainsman.

At the time our independence was earned, the American nation was made up of a nearly three million people scattered along the Atlantic coast. Beyond the tumble-down fences of the New England farmer stretched out a million square miles of forest, rich in treasures of oak, ash, of poplar, of pine. Farther on were prairies, of waving grass. Beyond were the Rocky mountains underlaid with untold mineral wealth.

The stroke of the woodman's ax was heard in the land and the conquest of the continent had begun. Where there had been wooded wastes there soon sprang up the great states of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois. At the South "King Cotton" was crying out for more land. Presently the land-hungry planters drove the Mexicans across the Rio Grande and the southwest Empire of Texas was ours. From California came the cry of "gold." Men dropped plow and saw and rushed madly to the Pacific.

There a new, rash, gambling civilization sprang up in the land of the stately Spaniards. The Mormons, persecuted in the East, turned their faces westward and made the deserts of Utah into gardens. The Union Pacific railroad united east and west.

with bands of steel and all America was won.

This then is the thing—the conquest of a continent is the thing, the accomplishment of which has made Americans patriotic.

But American patriotism has another element. "It is not race or tradition nor the actual past which binds the American to his fellow countrymen," says Prof. Hugo Münsterberg. "It is rather the future which unites them, and this is true. An American, which is not the land of promise, which is not informed by a prophetic outlook would not be the America bequeathed to us by our forefathers."

And now, when Americans speak of their land as a land of promise they mean, of course, in general, that the future will have something better store for them individually and collectively than they have yet enjoyed. But beyond this the average American may mean anything or nothing when he speaks of his land as a land of promise. How is this promise to be fulfilled? Will it fulfill itself or will its fulfillment demands of the nation a certain kind of conduct?

To the average American of yesterday the better American future was a consummation expected to take care of itself. It was thought that the new momentum of the country would take it whether we desired to go. But the 20th century has rudely shattered such complacent patriotism. We have been made to realize that the speedy conquest of the continent was not accomplished without an insane activity of ours and save. We have been shown that America is no longer a land of incalculable even of uncalculable natural wealth. We can no longer still the cries of economic distress with largesse of western land. The shimmering alkali sands, which alone remain unchanged, laugh at the plow and the harrow. To the westward surge of emigration the Pacific has said "Halt!" The fierce restlessness of the discontented is turned in upon itself. Into our relentless cities flock the unemployed and the claimants who formerly would have gone west.

New and strange problems arise with bewildering rapidity. The labor problem is here. The slums are here. They can not be conjured away by unlimited faith in the future of America. They tell us of a hunger-horn degradation of which bloody revolutions may be made. They ask in terms strange for a "square deal."

How shall we handle these new and pressing problems? To whom shall we look for the wisdom that will assure us of honor and of safety?

It seems to me that these are pertinent questions. It seems to me that it is only fitting and proper that we should consider them here and now.

For here stands Marietta, the city of the pioneers. Marietta—a monument to the men who braved down a wilderness and set up a state, who drove out savagery and set up culture. On this occasion we honor the men who were one in spirit with the pioneers. On this occasion we honor the men who made this nation a nation in point of fact as well as in point of theory. On this occasion we honor the men who made liberty a reality of life for all.
